Slobodan Polic. obrazac podnošenja zahtjeva obrazac potpisana od oba roditelja Category:Neuquén Category:Juries Category:Juvenile law On Monday night, Barry Moss, owner of the private hunting compound up in Breckenridge, got a call from a doctor. The man wanted to know if he could use a meeting to build some supporters for an issue that was troubling him. The doctor, who wanted to remain anonymous, said he was not a doctor. He had been booked, and they were going to run some tests on him. But he was fine. At the time, Moss knew it was probably just some overly aggressive reporter from the town of Breckenridge or some Google employee, but he accepted the call anyway. The man on the other line wanted to talk about gun control. He told Moss that in recent years, gun control laws had become popular in the United States. He wanted to help move the issue forward. He said he had made plans to travel to gun-free zones like Chicago and Boston, where Moss knew he would not be allowed to carry his handgun. But at his event, he said, he could tell people he was armed. "And I think they would accept me," he said. "They'll just assume someone like me is safe." It was an absurd suggestion, and I imagined the man would be laughed out of a meeting and told not to contact the publisher again. Over the past few years, I've spoken to pro-gun activists who make similar claims. They say that if they had a gun, they could help people. They say they're in favor of the Second Amendment, but when it comes to gun control, they say the gun owners are a bunch of wackos who shouldn't be trusted. If they are armed, they will help. If they go through a background check, they will be treated with a new respect. If they can show they are open to the other side, they say they could move the pendulum of opinion. They say they're just like everyone else. f678ea9f9e
